Heat Stress in Broilers

Written By: Aizwarya (Ash) Thanabalan, PhD - JFM Poultry Technical Services

Broilers are prone to heat stress! The rapid growth rates of broilers make them susceptible to heat stress, as these birds produce large amounts of body heat with minimal mechanisms to dissipate. High temperatures suppress feed intake, directly leading to depressed growth rates and poor feed conversion efficiency. To cope, heat-stressed broilers significantly increase water consumption and pant excessively, which can escalate to high mortality rates during severe heat waves. Furthermore, prolonged exposure weakens the immune system, leaving the flock highly susceptible to disease and compromising overall performance. To mitigate these negative impacts, producers must implement effective management strategies such as:

- Clean and maintain fans to ensure sufficient air speed to create a wind chill
- Provide access to cool drinking water, with electrolytes or Phytozen to help cool bird body temperature
- Encourage birds to stand to dissipate heat, but walk barns carefully

Electrolytes

The JFM Nutrition Department reminds all equine owners and caretakers to be mindful of your horse's water consumption during the summer months. The hot humid weather we experience during this period will increase your horse's water requirements. Providing salt and electrolytes in the diet can stimulate your horse's thirst response and encourage adequate water consumption. As well, when horses sweat excessively due to exercise or heat and humidity, they lose important nutrients (electrolytes), such as sodium, chloride, potassium, calcium, and magnesium. Feeding supplemental electrolytes helps to replenish these nutrients lost due to excessive sweating. A deficiency in these nutrients can lead to reduced exercise tolerance and muscle problems.

Remember to stop by The Millers Stone Store to pickup some electrolytes for your equine companion.

Remove The Wrap

With the warm weather here, JFM would like to remind our customers to please remove the plastic wrap from skids upon receipt. Leaving the wrap on can cause sweating, mold, and mustiness during hot weather. This reminder is also noted on our invoices.
