Summer Bunk Management

By Jarrett Hargrave, JFM Beef Sales Consultant

As the weather warms up, the JFM Beef Team would like to remind producers of the importance of good bunk management. The key to proper bunk management is making sure that there is feed readily available for cattle at any given point between feed deliveries. At each subsequent feeding, we recommend that there be only a few crumbs and kernels remaining in the bunk. An empty bunk promotes slug feeding. Slug feeding occurs when cattle go for extended periods of time without feed. Cattle then tend to gorge after new feed delivery, leading to acidic pH in the rumen. This may result in cattle going off feed and higher incidences of bloat, meaning cattle will not perform to their full potential. This issue can be amplified during hot weather as cattle tend to prefer to eat when it is cooler and so their eating patterns may be further disrupted, promoting rumen acidosis. It is also important to ensure that bunks are clean and free of waste products such as manure, or spoiled feeds to keep feed fresh and bunk activity high.

For more information on bunk management and other summer management tips, feel free to contact a member of the JFM Beef Team.
